Armstrong at Saatchi

A piece of art by local artist Evelyn Armstrong, A Landscape of Unsettled Emotion and Changing Ecological Conditions, started appearing this week with other works on a screen set up on the 2nd floor of the Saatchi Gallery in London, UK.

An end date has not been decided yet on this ongoing project, and Evelyn's piece will be in rotation with the others until the end of the project.

End of the line with TOTA

City Council decided against taking the next step with TOTA's Destination Branding Project, which would have cost over $19,000.

In the meantime, we're still waiting for the outcome of the May 12 & 13 open houses that were to narrow down a second round of tagline options, after the community's earlier uproar about 'country with attitude'.

At the open houses, TOTA project manager Simone Carlysle-Smith also proposed highway signage, however it looks like that may be a longer-term implementation. Under the current contract, TOTA still needs to suggest the tagline, conduct a web presence audit and complete a branding book.

Coastal First Nations declare NGP "effectively dead"

Enbridge's Northern Gateway pipeline is "effectively dead" because Enbridge will never meet the conditions for approval outlined by the federal govt.

The government's announcement giving its approval to Enbridge is meaningless. "It's an approval in name only. This project is dead," said Art Sterritt, Executive Director of the Coastal First Nations. "The project can't proceed with these conditions. We've been clear there is no technology to clean up an oil spill and the dispersant that is used causes more damage than the oil itself."

Today's announcement doesn't change anything, Sterritt said. "We've spent millions of dollars developing a sustainable economy. We're not going to risk it by allowing oil tankers in our waters. It is those living on BC's coast that will bear all the risks of an oil spill."

It's been suggested the BC government is nervous that a federal approval of Northern Gateway could endanger negotiations with First Nations in Northern BC on the future of LNG development. Sterritt says that risk is real.

"The federal government lost an opportunity today to reject Northern Gateway," said Sterritt. "They've now left it to Premier Clark to make the situation clear, and to preserve a wider dialogue and consideration of resource development in BC. We're looking at Premier Clark to say no to Northern Gateway."

First Nations and their allies are still weighing a range of legal and direct action responses to today's approval, but will wait to see what Enbridge does next.

"We'll see if Enbridge dares to put its shovels in the ground," said Sterritt. "First Nations and our allies will protect our rights and the interests of future generations. We will never allow oil tankers into our territorial waters."
