Thoughts from Outside the Box

Pyramids Part 2

The Ancients' understanding of the Universe and nature's principles is the motivation behind the practice of mummification. The Pharaohs of Egypt, attempting to prolong their stay in the Astral Plane, requested that after death specific organs of the body be preserved. They believed that there exists a link between the body and the spirit, and the spirit will automatically enter the cycle of reincarnation after the body has reached a specific stage of decay. To prolong the period between the death of the body and the spirit moving on, they used mummification.

The Pharaohs desired to stay in the Astral Plane for as long as possible to meditate on The Source/God, which was said to increase the chances of a favourable reincarnation. A Pharaoh wished a rebirth as a Pharaoh.

In the practice of mummification, the brain is typically discarded, and this is because the Ancients believed that the brain is the source of all evil and the brain is what deters a person from loving The Source.

The time and space of thought isn't solely influenced by the brain and the ancient people believed that other organs in the body also house programming able to impact the construction of thoughts—in particular, an organs subtle essence. For this reason, they recommended habits as thinking from the heart, and when they said such things as "this is from the heart" they were referencing the heart's programming and its nature to construct the purest and most loving thoughts. This, the brain cannot produce. True love comes from the heart's programming, but not many modern men and women are taught how to think from the heart.
