Wind turbines impact on bats

Wind turbines are considered an environmentally friendly way to generate electricity. But they are often deadly for bats — a new study last week estimated wind turbines killed 18.7 million bats in the U.S. alone between 1981 and 2024, and the death toll had grown, with the expansion of wind energy, to about 1.5 million bats per year by 2021.

In Canada, the evidence is also scary, especially for our three migratory bat species: A 2023 scientific assessment of the hoary bat, eastern red bat and silver-haired bat found they all face "high risk of mortality at wind energy facilities."

The main source of evidence? Declining numbers of dead bats found under wind turbines, killed by either collisions or the dramatic pressure changes near the blades.

Dana Green, a biologist who co-authored the assessment, said the bats don't seem to be learning to stay away, so the fact that there are fewer dead bats points to a plummeting population — the report recommended they be federally listed as endangered.

Scientific models suggest "fatalities associated with wind energy facilities" could lead to a 90 per cent population decline over 50 years for the hoary bat and a 22 per cent probability of extinction over 100 years.

Wind turbines don't kill all bats equally. Most species of Canada are small, brown bats that hibernate in Canada and face little risk from turbines (although they've been decimated by a deadly disease called white-nose syndrome).

It's the three more colourful migratory species that tend to die from wind turbines during their fall migration to hibernate in the southern U.S. and Mexico.

That's when they fly through the wide open migratory pathways where wind turbines are often located.

Green, a postdoctoral researcher at the University of Northern British Columbia, said hoary bats, Canada's largest bat species, seem to be attracted to turbines, although researchers don't know why.

What can be done?

The main strategy for protecting bats is "curtailment," which means shutting off wind turbines during certain times if bats are at risk.

In Ontario, such rules apply to a wind farm if bat mortality is more than 10 bats per turbine per year.

Wind turbines & bats

Normally, wind turbines start operating at wind speeds of three or four metres per second. But between sunrise and sunset between July 15 and Sept. 30, the rules ban operation if the wind speed is below 5.5 metres per second, since bats tend to fly when it's less windy.

Because this "blanket" curtailment reduces the amount of power and revenue a wind farm can generate, more targeted solutions have also been developed.

Wind turbines in Elmira, P.E.I. A number of strategies can help protect bats from dying due to wind turbines, such as shutting them off at night during fall migration. (Aaron Adetuyi/CBC)

"Smart" curtailment uses ultrasonic microphones to detect bats and automatically shut off one or more nearby turbines.

At the Electricity Transformation Canada conference in Toronto last week, Andrew Taylor, a senior ecologist at Stantec Consulting, said smart curtailment can be expensive because it requires a lot of detectors. Depending on the range of the detectors, the bat could be at risk before the curtailment kicks in — something that also concerns Green.

Taylor said smart curtailment can also make it hard for wind companies to predict how much energy and revenue they could lose due to temporary shutdowns.

He presented a solution developed by his company that involves using fewer detectors to monitor bats for a year, relating the number of bats to wind and weather patterns, and then using that information to fine-tune when to shut off the turbines. "We do like to think that we're letting the bats tell us when it's best to curtail," he said.

Ian Maynard, a research engineer at a Natural Resources Canada lab focused on renewable energy, did a recent analysis of 51 scientific studies on mitigating bat deaths from wind turbines as well as some of his own modelling in Ontario.

Maynard said the difference in annual electricity generation and revenues between smart and blanket curtailment is only about two to three per cent, so the higher-tech solution may not always be worth it.

Some studies looked at sounds, colours or lighting to deter bats. Maynard said that's "where a lot of people want to go," but their effectiveness depends on the location and bat species.

He found that many studies mitigating bat deaths from turbines weren't large or transparent enough to be reproducible.

"There needs to be options available," he said. But he added that good scientific evidence is needed before policies can allow them. "That's kind of the next step."

For now, Green thinks a federal, Canada-wide blanket curtailment policy is needed. She thinks green energy is "fantastic" and "absolutely" believes wind energy and migratory bats can coexist, but wind developers need to do more to protect bats. "If green energy wants to advertise itself as green, then put your money where your mouth is."
